

media release

“The Prince cruised along 75 Mile Beach, through the rainforest, expressing his interest in the ecology, learnt about the waste treatment system at Kingfisher Bay Resort, and shared stories of similar environmental initiatives on some of his properties”.

It’s only fitting that the couple make a royal return to Fraser Island, for the chance to experience this natural wonder for themselves.

5. Natural beauty abounds, especially at the day spa

We have learnt that Meghan always travels with tea tree oil in her carry-on, quoted as saying ‘it’s my little cure-all’.

In addition to the lemon-scented tea tree, and the iconic eucalyptus, Fraser Island is home to a range of other rare and native plant species. Guests at Kingfisher Bay Resort can embark on a guided "Bush Medicine" walk around the sprawling resort grounds, discovering the native remedies available, and learning how they were used within traditional Butchulla culture.

For a relaxing, back-to-nature experience, guests can retreat to the resort’s Island Day Spa, which uses Brisbane-based aromatherapy brand Perfect Potion, for soothing treatments inspired by the native island surrounds.

With Fraser Island firmly on the map, nature-lovers all over the world will undoubtedly add Fraser Island to their list, as a must-see destination.

For media enquiries, familiarisations at Kingfisher Bay Resort, or images related to the royal visit on Fraser Island, please contact:

ENDS

MONIQUE PARKER

Group Communications Manager, Kingfisher Bay Resort

media@kingfisherbay.com

+61 419 647 752